

A Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man

- Title / Autobiography / Images

"A Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man" is at once an autobiography and a work of art or 'Portrait'. But the book declares the identity of Stephen Hero as an art piece and that of the author as an 'artist' and not a biographer. The creative tension thus stems from Joyce's declared intention to present a personal and subjective narrative as an objective creation of art. The technique applied envisages the simultaneous operation of two artists, the embryo artist who is revealing himself while he is re-living his past, and the artist-narrator who is 'portraying' him. The narrator tells the story but virtually it is the hero himself who is casting the story out of the material deposited in the subconscious or memory. The author registers his presence like 'the god of the creation'. The process renders the book 'extraordinarily sharp and objective' for an autobiographical novel.

The nursery rhyme and the nursery tale recaptured and produced in their original texture and the child habit of thinking in a fragmentary way take us straight into the child's sub-conscious. This induces us to believe that Stephen himself is revealing his story. But the speech distortion - 'O, the green Wothe bofeth' implies that the whole thing is being presented by the observer-narrator, for how could the child know about his own speech habits? This simultaneity of self reporting, and self distancing invests the 'portrait' with complexity. The duality becomes clear later on, when Stephen is being beaten by the pandy bat, his sensations are described as follows: "A hot burning stinging tingling blow like the loud crack of a broken stick made his trembling hand crumple together like a leaf in the fire . . ." The sensations - 'burning', 'stinging', 'tingling' - are all Stephen's but the image - 'crumple together like a leaf in the fire' - is a prop to dramatise the effect.